Name of programme or project	Developing a national cadre of citizen journalists producing socially relevant content for dissemination across multi-media platforms. Contract Ref - CSO-LA/2017/ 386-675
Date and end date	18 July 2017 - 17 August 2019
Beneficiary Member(s) or observer(s)	South Africa
Brief description	Big Fish and their co-applicant Health-e are undertaking a 25-month programme training a total of 150 young people (citizen journalists) in three cohorts on video production and storytelling for socially relevant topics. The courses run consecutively for 3-months in Cape Town, followed by 10-months of content production and mentorship for each group. It covers all aspects of planning and implementing video productions, including interviews, camerawork, and post-production, such as editing etc. The course also covers teaching of business- and life skills to the citizen journalists. Over the course of the programme, young journalists learn to represent the most marginalised groups in community who often fail to have their voices heard and recognized, through collaborating with various civil society organisations to create video stories and reports. Through this, the students learn skills to access the labour market, either by working independently, or finding a job within the production industry. Each citizen journalist is equipped with a mobile phone, microphone, laptop and editing software; this innovative approach gives them the opportunity to produce content on-the-go.

Though owning these items makes students targets of theft as well, the benefits include allowing everyone to work and learn at their own pace on all aspects of content production, and students being able to work on-the-go, in the evenings and over the weekends. - An opportunity arose for the Citizen Journalists to apply for an extended course duration, which provides the participants with a National Certificate in Film and TV Production.
