The question of reciprocity discussed by the members of Working Party 1 is one of great importance. The problem does not arise among the countries signatories to the Convention; but it would be very useful to have definite provisions specifying the extent of the obligations of countries members of the General Agreement and signatories to the Convention towards countries members of the General Agreement which have not signed the Convention, but are bound as members of the General Agreement by the most-favoured-nation clause.

In those circumstances, the existence of a reciprocity clause, binding upon States not signatories to the Convention and constituting an essential condition for the extension to them of the benefits of the Convention, would make the treatment equitable and just on both sides.

It would appear, however, that consideration of the relations between various international bodies, and the resulting conflicts would go beyond the terms of reference given by the Contracting Parties to the Working Party.

The Greek delegation's proposal is that the report to be drawn up by the Working Party should make special mention of this point, and should express the hope that the problem will be dealt with by the Contracting Parties.
